For example, the English chin is Kinn in German. Water becomes Wasser and father turns into Vater. Not so hard after all.

2. German is the language of inventors and innovators

It is said that Germany is the country of poets and thinkers – Das Land der Dichter und Denker. There is definitely no denying the second part. A large percentage of the world's most impressive achievements were first conceived of in German.

3. German is an important language in academia

With so many award-winning scientists from its home country, it might not come as a surprise that German is very important in the academic community. In fact, it ranks second as the most commonly used scientific language.

5. German is the most widely spoken native language in Europe

English, French and German are the three official working languages of the European Union. In absolute numbers, German is the second most-spoken language on the continent of Europe. However, when it comes to native speakers, German is number one.
